You can simply say "Added Angela and Peter to recipient list" but as @jwpat7 said, the list of the recipients is normally visible to everybody who receives the email. It be could useful to list those who ...

This report problem is a singular noun phrase, so you must use the singular verb form has. You'd use the plural if you were saying These report problems have been resolved.

A new review was added on Sam's Bowling alley. My confusion is whether it should be on, to, or in. A review is added to/or/in a place (coffee place, library, museum, etc) I'm finding it a little hard to find ...

"Added" to something else means it was a later addition to something that already existed. So, if you were speaking about the original software product rather than the specific release, ...

A lot of sugar have/has been added to the milk. No, the verb should be the singular "has". The quantificational noun "lot" is number-transparent, which means that the whole noun phrase takes ...

Adding "isn't it?" or "wasn't it?" after any positive statement to turn it into a question expecting an affirmative answer is a mistake in standard English, but often found in South Asian (e.g. ...

I thought the sentence "if you added some salt, it would be better" talks about a imaginary situation and unfulfilled. "Imaginary situation" and "make suggestion" aren't the same, ...

What is right way to write or speak? I am a developer and want to add message to my application once the record has been added to the database. So I am confused about the right way to write/speak...

2 as a bonus would suffice. Bonus already means "something extra", and is derived from the Latin bonus ("good"). as an added bonus is informal since it has a redundancy.
